US equities selloff on growth scare

Summary

US equities slumped on concerns President Trump may tolerate short term pain to solve long-term challenges. Tariff uncertainty, weaker US economic data contrasting with improving Euro area outlook, and federal job cuts have challenged "US exceptionalism".

The S&P 500 and Nasdag 100 indices fell 2.7% and 3.8%, respectively. The S&P500 volatility index (VIX), the so-called "fear gauge", soared to a six-month high of 28. The S&P 500 and Nasdag indices have fallen 9% and 13% from their record highs, respectively.

Safe-haven assets in favour. The JPY, USD, and US government bonds rose. Risk-off sentiment also triggered an outperformance of defensive equity sectors vs. growth sectors, such as technology.

We remain diversified across asset classes and geographies to navigate volatility, while adding to US equities on dips. Fed rate cuts and likely tax cuts should enable the US to avoid a recession. We use the sell-off as an opportunity to diversify into software, 6,400 communication, financial and small cap sectors. We also look to add 6,000 to Developed Market High Yield bonds amid limited default risks.

Background and policy implications

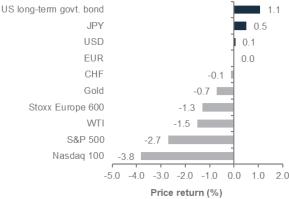

Growth concerns rise. The US risk asset drawdown coincides with a deterioration in the US economic outlook. US economic surprises turned negative in February as consumer and business confidence flagged amid growing concerns that President Trump's tariff plans, immigration curbs and government spending cuts are likely to hurt growth. Although Trump has paused tariffs on Mexico and Canada for a month, tariffs on China have risen to an average 30%.

Short-term pain vs. long-term gain? There is concern that Trump may be willing to sacrifice short-term growth and tolerate a brief equity market downturn to achieve his long-term goal of pushing through tax cuts, cutting government waste, deregulating industries and attracting more foreign investments into US manufacturing. If that were the case, there is scope for US equities to fall another 4-5% before Trump recalibrates policy. Lower US bond yields, weaker USD and slowing growth should help Trump to push tax cuts through Congress.

Watching business confidence, job market, inflation. US small business optimism data from NFIB and job openings data are due tonight. Small business optimism surged after Trump's election win in November but appears to have peaked. Meanwhile, the job market is slowing, with any further deterioration likely to lift the jobless rate. Meanwhile, inflation indicators are rising again. February's inflation data is due tomorrow. A slowing job market and rising inflation could revive stagflation risks, putting the Fed in a bind.

What does this mean for investors?

Equities

US equities may see another 5% consolidation in the next few weeks as the US goes through a "transition" phase, as described by Trump. Meanwhile, improving Euro area outlook, after Germany's incoming coalition government proposed to boost infrastructure spending by EUR 500bn and proposed changing constitutional debt limits to enable higher defence spending, has challenged the so-called "US exceptionalism" narrative.

In the near term, the cyclical sector is likely to be most vulnerable, along with those within the so-called "Magnificent Seven" group of growth stocks that trade at high valuation and have crowded investor positioning. However, US exceptionalism is not yet over, in our view. A US recession risk, while rising (given policy uncertainty), is not our base case, and hence, our view to buy US stocks on dips.

With US earnings expected to grow more than 12% over the next 12 months - which is still superior to other regions, despite the recent downgrade - and structural tailwinds, such as surging Al-related demand still intact, we recommend adding to technology software and communication services sectors. We also recommend US small caps that are insulated against tariffs and the financial sector which is likely to benefit from Trump's deregulation policies. We see next key support for the S&P500 index at 5,403.

Bonds

Since Trump assumed office in January, rising growth and policy uncertainty has contributed to a rally in US government bonds, reflecting flight-to-safety sentiment. The US 10-year government bond yield has declined more than 40bps since his inauguration and closed yesterday at 4.18%. It now trades below the 200-day moving average of 4.23%. The yield is within our 12-month target range of 4-4.25%. A break below could see the 10-year yield testing the psychological support level of 4%, followed by last year's low of 3.6%.

US Investment Grade (IG) bonds have been resilient through the recent equity market volatility, with the yield premium widening only by 4bps, while the headline yield fell 7bps. On the contrary, the US High Yield (HY) yield premium widened by 19bps, while the headline yield rose 10bps. Despite escalating growth concerns, we expect corporate defaults to remain in check. Thus, we see the recent 170 volatility as an opportunity to add exposure to HY bonds.

FX

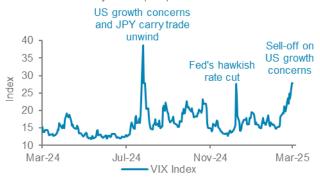

The USD index (DXY) has stabilised around 103.7 amid haven demand after plunging c. 6% from January's 26-month high of 110.2.

On technical charts, DXY has broken below the 200-day moving average but is now in oversold territory. Therefore, further downside 120 is likely limited, with near-term support at 102.4. US job openings and small business optimism data (from NFIB) today and consumer inflation data tomorrow will be closely watched for clearer direction.

Given weak risk appetite, we see the JPY as likely outperformer among G10 currencies in the near term. The JPY is getting a lift from a rise in Japan's 10-year government bond yield to its highest since 2008. Going forward, USD/JPY could see further downside if US inflation data this week turns soft and the first results from the Japan's spring wage negotiations show big gains in pay. The pair has been trading in the descending channel since mid-January and is likely to test its support around 145.2, followed by 141.7.
